Not for years has so much enthusiasm been evinced in rowing in Washington as there was yesterday. Several thousand people watched the races from small boats, the Aqueduct Bridge, and the banks of the river. At the finish, where most interest centered, the river was black with boats.

Bets were placed on the First Bohemdefeat in the national regatta, when he was declared out of condition, had trained hard, and was thought to have regained his old form. But Vesley had the weight and strength, and was in remarkably good form.

Although there were four entries in this event it was evident soon after the start that the race was between the former national champion and Vesley. Vesley took the lead, and choosing a stroke of about thirty-three to the minute, held to it consistently. Titus rowed a trifle lower and kept a constant watch on his opponent. He seemed to have some difficulty in locating his position on the course, for he was continually looking around. At the end of the first half Vesley was leading by about a length.

This lead he increased until when he was nearly opposite the Georgetown boat nouse-about 200 yards from the finishhe had nearly two lengths on Titus. Here it was that the former champion began a spurt that brought forth the cheers of thousands who lined the
